Report

It is often difficult to perceive the value of things until their service is at hand. Perhaps the same is true of and can be said per the relevance, significance and utility of the Internet Applications class within the Library and Information Technician Program.

In summation, the class has been personally grueling and academically consuming. My areas of strength within the greater program have received little attention this semester, and the mental toll has been exacting upon me to speak in truth and in confidence.

The class shares the gift of pain, a searing kiss whose mark is upon me. This defines its purpose and value. In a professional setting, letting anyone short of a dedicated professional poke around in the code will end up costing a fortune, and if this subject comes easily, it will likely be pursued as it is a rare talent with routes to an in-demand career.

Life is a test of endurance. To abide and remain productive across the storm is something we witness and respect, something we strive towards. This class has shown me that I can do anything, and will continue to remind me thus. In times of future trial, and they always come, I will look to the IA brand upon me and know that all is possible. I will know, fervently and without doubt, that something entirely new can be made from effort at any time.

The lessons of this class reign valid and everlasting.

It is one of strength, and finding proof in the self.

Thank you.
